

Five Tips to Get Your Teenager Talking

from Jonathan McKee at TheSource4Parents.com

We've all felt it. Our kids used to talk with us, but then something happened. They hit puberty. All of a sudden. . . conversation became a chore!

So what are some ways moms and dads can open up the doors to meaningful conversation with our kids? Here are five tips from my book, Get Your Teenager Talking, a book with over 1,000 questions that actually "get your teenager talking."

1. Don't ask yes or no questions. Ask questions that require more than a one-word response.
2. Don't ask dull questions. Don't ask, "How was your day?" They're tired of that. Think of imaginative questions that will engage your teen.
3. Think ahead. Conversation with your teen takes planning! It's okay to cheat and use resources that provide creative questions.
4. Don't be afraid to use controversy. Bring up a debatable subject and ask your kids' opinions. Many schools are blocking social media on campus. Why? Is this fair? What would you do if you were in charge?
5. Use your eyes and ears before your mouth. Listen to your teen. Enter their world.

Try it. At dinner tonight ask your kids, "If you could text anyone in the world right now and you knew they'd actually reply, who would you text?"

Follow up with a few more questions:

- "What would you text them?"
- "What would you hope they'd reply?"
- "If you could only text one person for a year—someone you already text, who would it be and why?"

Open up the doors to meaningful conversation in your home!
